AMENDED MEMORANDUM AND ORDER¹

AND RELATED CASES.

On July 30, 2019, California Governor Gavin Newsom signed into law the Presidential Tax and Transparency Act (“the Act”), enacted as Senate Bill 27, which requires, among other things, presidential candidates in the California primary to have disclosed their federal tax returns for the previous five years as a precondition to appearing on the State’s partisan primary ballot.² By way of the above-captioned related ¹ This Amended Memorandum and Order is identical to its predecessor, filed on October 1, 2019, except that it corrects a typographical error, found on page 9 of the original Order, to correctly state “three terms in the United States House of Representatives, or two terms in the United States Senate. . .” See Am. Mem. and Order, 10:1-2. That correction does not change the substantive decision of this Court in any way.

² The Act was codified as Chapter 7 to Part 1 of Division 6 of the California Elections Code, §§ 6880 et seq.

1 actions, five sets of Plaintiffs seek to enjoin enforcement of that law by Defendants 2 Governor Newsom, Alex Padilla, California’s Secretary of State, and Xavier Becerra, in 3 his capacity as California Attorney General.³ Plaintiffs are the incumbent President, 4 Donald J. Trump, along with his reelection campaign, a second Republican candidate for 5 President, Roque De La Fuente, both the Republican National Committee and its state 6 counterpart, the California Republican Party, and eight individual California voters, 7 including members of both the Republican, Democratic and Independent Parties.

8 According to all Plaintiffs, the Act violates the so-called Qualifications Clause of 9 the United States Constitution. U.S. Const., art, II, § 1, cl. 5 (“Qualifications Clause”).
10 Four of the five lawsuits further allege that the Act violates Plaintiffs’ First Amendment 11 rights to associate and/or to access the ballot, also guaranteed by the United States 12 Constitution. In addition, two of the actions take the position that the Act also violates 13 the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause. Finally, the lawsuit filed on 14 behalf of President Trump and his campaign asserts that the Act’s provisions are 15 preempted by the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 5 U.S.C.A. App. 4, §§ 101 et seq.
16 (“EIGA”), which requires that presidential candidates disclose certain financial 17 information.

18 The Court heard oral argument on September 19, 2019, and, at the hearing’s 19 conclusion, announced its tentative decision granting a preliminary injunction enjoining 20 application of the Act insofar as it pertains to presidential candidates. This written order 21 memorializes that ruling and supersedes any and all statements made by the Court at 22 that time. For the reasons set forth below, the requests for preliminary injunctive relief 23 are GRANTED.

“Defendants” or the “State” unless otherwise noted.

BACKGROUND

3 In 1913, the Sixteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution was ratified 4 authorizing a national income tax to be implemented through the filing of individual tax 5 returns with the Internal Revenue Service. Since that time, there has never been a legal 6 requirement that any candidate for federal office disclose their tax returns as a 7 precondition to standing for election. The Act, which provides in relevant part as follows, 8 attempts to change that:

9 6883. (a) Notwithstanding any other law, the Secretary of 10 State shall not print the name of a candidate for President of 11 the United States on a primary election ballot, unless the 12 candidate, at least 98 days before the presidential primary election, files with the Secretary of State copies of every income tax return the candidate filed with the Internal Revenue Service in the five most recent taxable years.

13 Cal. Elec. Code § 6883(a). It goes on to require the Secretary of State to publish a copy 14 of the candidate’s personal tax returns on the Secretary’s publicly available website, 15 after redacting the returns for privacy purposes. Id. at § 6884(c). Because the Act 16 applies only to primaries and not to the general election, however, independent and 17 certified write-in candidates are not required to disclose their tax returns as a condition of 18 running for President. Id. at §§ 8300, 8600.

19 The California Legislature formally explained its justification for passing the Act in 20 a purpose statement which reads:

21 [The] State of California has a strong interest in ensuring that 22 its voters make informed, educated choices in the voting 23 booth. To this end, the state has mandated that extensive 24 amounts of information be provided to voters, including 25 county and state voter information guide. The Legislature also finds and declares that a Presidential candidate’s income tax returns provide voters with essential information regarding the candidate’s potential conflicts of interest, business dealings, financial status and charitable donations.

26 Id. at § 6881. Despite this attempt to couch the Act as an informational device to be 27 applied equally to all candidates, however, the legislative history and statements made 28 by state legislators during its consideration strongly suggest it was primarily intended to 1 force President Trump to disclose his tax returns.⁴ Indeed, at oral argument counsel for 2 the State expressly conceded that the Act “was prompted by President Trump’s refusal 3 to disclose his tax return when he ran for . . . office.” Transcript of September 19, 2019

4 hearing, ECF No. 37 to Case No. 19-cv-1477-MCE-DB, 55:12-15. Likewise, State 5 Senator Mike McGuire, who co-sponsored the Act in the California Senate, has 6 unequivocally indicated that “it will make presidential tax returns public in [California] just 7 in time for the 2020 election.” Pl. Melendez’ Mot., 19-cv-01506-MCE-DB, ECF No. 17-1, 8 at 5:26-27; 6:5-6. McGuire has further stated that “President Trump, if he truly doesn’t 9 have anything to hide, should step up and release his tax returns.” Id. at 5:28-6:1.

10 Defendants also describe the Act as having been enacted in response to 11 President Trump’s “break” from “customary practice” in choosing not to disclose his 12 returns. See Defs.’ Omnibus Opp, 3:22-24. But such production has hardly been 13 universal. Between 1913, when income taxes were instituted, and 1973, when President 14 Nixon opted to disclose his returns after portions were leaked, no sitting President 15 elected to furnish his returns. Melendez Mot. at 2:21-22. In addition, Nixon’s successor, 16 Gerald Ford, opted to disclose only a summary of his taxes. Id. at 2:25. Nor have 17 presidential candidates universally released their tax filings. For example, in 1992, 18 former California Governor Jerry Brown, then a candidate for the Democratic nomination 19 for President, elected not to disclose his returns. Ross Perot similarly declined to 20 disclose that same year, and in 2000, Ralph Nader also decided against disclosure. Id.
21 at 2:28-3:8. Consequently, the State’s argument that the California Legislature passed 22 the Act “to codify a custom followed by presidential candidates in the past five decades” 23 is disingenuous. Defs.’ Opp., 1:6.

24 Against this backdrop, it is no surprise that the one other time California 25 attempted to pass a law such as the one challenged here, shortly after President

26 ⁴ Trump has made extensive disclosures of his personal financial information in accordance with 27 the provisions of EIGA, but has never disclosed his tax returns themselves. Additionally, when he 28 announced his candidacy for reelection in 2020, Trump reiterated that he would not disclose his filings prior to either the 2020 primary or general elections. See Pl. Melendez’ Mot., 19-cv-01506-MCE-DB, ECF
No. 17-1, 6:12-17.

1 Trump’s election, it was unsuccessful. More specifically, in 2017, the California
2 Legislature passed a bill known as SB 149 that, like the Act, would have required
3 candidates to release their returns as a precondition for appearing on the California 4 primary ballot. In analyzing that legislation before it came to a vote, however, 5 California’s Office of the Legislative Counsel—a nonpartisan public agency— “concluded 6 that [SB 149] would be unconstitutional if enacted.” Cal. Comm. on the Judiciary Report, 7 Senate, March 11, 2019 at 5 (citing Ops. Cal. Legis. Counsel, No. 1718407 (Sept. 7, 8 2017)). Regardless, the Legislature approved the bill anyway and sent it to then-9 Governor Jerry Brown for his signature. Governor Brown then vetoed the legislation, 10 articulating his many reservations as follows:

11 This bill is a response to President Trump’s refusal to release 12 his returns during the last election. While I recognize the 13 political attractiveness – even the merits – of getting 14 President Trump’s tax returns, I worry about the political 15 perils of individual states seeking to regulate presidential 16 elections in this manner. First, it may not be constitutional.
17 Second, it sets a ‘slippery slope’ precedent. Today we 18 require tax returns, but what would be next? Five years of 19 health records? A certified birth certificate? High school 20 report cards? And will these requirements vary depending on 21 which political party is in power?

18 Governor Jerry Brown, Governor’s Veto Message, SB 149, available at 19 https://leginfo.legislature.ca.gov/faces/billStatusClient.xhtml?bill_id=201720180SB149.
20 He concluded that conditioning ballot access on the disclosure of tax returns might 21 infringe upon settled constitutional rights, stating that “[a] qualified candidate’s ability to 22 appear on the ballot is fundamental to our democratic system.” Id. Accordingly, he 23 “hesitate[d] to start down a road that well might lead to an ever escalating set of differing 24 state requirements for presidential candidates.” Id.

25 Despite both Governor Brown’s warning and the Legislative Counsel’s earlier 26 admonition, the lead authors of SB 149 announced their intent to reintroduce the bill 27 when California had a new Governor. See McCarthy Decl, Case No. 2:19-cv-01501-
28 MCE-DB, ECF No. 10-2, ¶¶ 5-6. And follow through they did, introducing the present

1 Act on December 3, 2018, less than a month after Governor Newsom was elected to 2 office. Like its predecessor, the Act was again denominated as “the Presidential Tax 3 Transparency and Accountability Act” and contained the same material provisions as the 4 earlier SB 149, requiring partisan candidates to submit their tax returns from the five 5 previous years in order to appear on the primary ballot.⁵

6 Significantly, although no other state has enacted a requirement such as the one 7 at issue here,⁶ California pushed the envelope even further by passing the Act as an 8 “urgency statute” that would go into effect immediately.⁷ The Act was deemed “urgent” 9 in this regard even though California had been conducting presidential primary elections 10 without a tax disclosure requirement since the dawn of American income taxes more 11 than one hundred years prior.

12 Given the current date for California’s 2020 presidential primary, and the fact that 13 under the terms of the Act tax returns must be released 98 days beforehand, absent 14 injunctive relief, partisan candidates must disclose their taxes by November 26, 2019, in 15 order to appear on the California primary. The instant motions seek to enjoin that 16 requirement.

19 ///

22 ⁵ The Act differs somewhat from SB 149 in that the former contains more specific directions on 23 how candidates must present their tax returns to the California Secretary of State. In addition, the Act also 24 applies to state gubernatorial candidates who wish to participate in the primary election. All parties agreed at the September 19, 2019, hearing, however, that the present challenges pertains only to the Act’s application to presidential primaries.

25 ⁶ On May 1, 2017, Governor Chris Christie vetoed a similar bill, S3048, passed by the New Jersey Legislature. Melendez Mot., 3:24-25.

26 ⁷ The California Constitution normally provides for new laws to “go into effect on January 1 next 27 following a 90-day period from the date of enactment of the statute (Cal. Const., art. IV, § 8(c)(1), but by 28 denominating the statute as one of urgency “necessary for immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety” (id. at § 8(c)(3), 8(d)), the Act applied immediately and in time for California’s March 3, 2020 primary.

STANDARD

3 “A preliminary injunction is an extraordinary and drastic remedy.” Munaf v. Geren, 4 553 U.S. 674, 690 (2008). “[T]he purpose of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the 5 status quo between the parties pending a resolution of a case on the merits.”
6 McCormack v. Hiedeman, 694 F.3d 1004, 1019 (9th Cir. 2012). A plaintiff seeking a 7 preliminary injunction must establish that he is (1) “likely to succeed on the merits;”
8 (2) “likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief;” (3) “the balance 9 of equities tips in his favor;” and (4) “an injunction is in the public interest.” Winter v.
10 Natural Res. Defense Council, 555 U.S. 7, 20 (2008); see also Short v. Trown, 893 F.3d 11 671, 675 (9th Cir. 2018). “If a plaintiff fails to meet its burden on any of the four 12 requirements for injunctive relief, its request must be denied.” Sierra Forest Legacy v.
13 Rey, 691 F. Supp. 2d 1204, 1207 (E.D. Cal. 2010) (citing Winter, 555 U.S. at 22). “In 14 each case, courts ‘must balance the competing claims of injury and must consider the 15 effect on each party of the granting or withholding of the requested relief.’” Winter, 16 555 U.S. at 24 (quoting Amoco Prod. Co. v. Gambell, 480 U.S. 531, 542 (1987)). A 17 district court should enter a preliminary injunction only “upon a clear showing that the 18 plaintiff is entitled to such relief.” Winter, 555 U.S. at 22 (citing Mazurek v. Armstrong, 19 520 U.S. 968, 972 (1997)).

20 Alternatively, under the so-called sliding scale approach, “[t]he Ninth Circuit 21 weighs [the above] factors on a sliding scale”, so that where there are “‘serious 22 questions going to the merits’ --- that is, less than a ‘likelihood of success’ on the merits - 23 -- a preliminary injunction may still issue so long as ‘the balance of hardships tips sharply 24 in the plaintiff’s favor’ and the other two factors are satisfied.” Short v. Brown, 893 F.3d 25 671, 675 (9th Cir. 2018).

26 Where the moving party alleges constitutional violations, including violations of 27 rights secured by the First Amendment, they must make a “colorable claim” that their 28 rights have been infringed or threatened with infringement, but upon this showing “the 1 burden shifts to the government to justify the restriction.” Thalheimer v. City of 2 San Diego, 645 F.3d 1109, 1117 (9th Cir. 2019) (citing Klein v. City of San Clemente, 3 584 F.3d 1196, 1201 (9th Cir. 2009)).

4 5 ANALYSIS

7 The Court appreciates the State’s desire for transparency in the political process.
8 Requiring candidates to disclose tax returns could shed light on sources of income, 9 potential conflicts of interest, and charitable tendencies. This information is important to 10 a voter’s ability to evaluate how a candidate’s financial interests might affect future 11 decision making. For example, in what entities or countries have candidates invested?
12 Where have they donated? Who do they owe? These concerns are both legitimate and 13 understandable,⁸ but are undermined when candidates offer unnecessary and irrelevant 14 excuses for shielding the public from such information.

15 It is not the job of the courts, however, to decide whether a tax return disclosure 16 requirement is good policy or makes political sense. Those are questions delegated to 17 the political branches of the federal government, that is Congress and the President, 18 under Articles I and II of the United States Constitution. Those are the branches that 19 make the law. Article III Courts such as this one, on the other hand, are tasked with 20 interpreting the law and evaluating whether laws passed by the other two branches of 21 federal government or by the states are constitutional in the first place. The job of the 22 federal courts is therefore to follow the law and to decide questions based on the United 23 States Constitution, which is the only thing the Court is being asked to do in these cases.
24 Courts created under Article III of the United States Constitution are not concerned with 25 political victories or who may or may not “win.” Instead, it is the Court’s job to make sure 26 the Constitution wins. To that end, while this Court understands and empathizes with 27 28 ⁸ In fact, these are some of the same considerations our nation takes into account when evaluating individuals who have been confirmed by the United States Senate for security clearances.

1 the motivations that prompted California to pass the Act, it concludes that a preliminary 2 injunction should nonetheless issue because the Act's provisions likely violate the 3 Constitution and the laws of the United States.

4 A. Likelihood of Success on the Merits

5 1. Qualifications Clause

6 The Presidential Qualifications Clause of the United States Constitution sets forth 7 the eligibility requirements for the Office of President:

8 No person except a natural born Citizen . . . shall be eligible 9 to the Office of President; neither shall any person be eligible 10 to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

11 U.S. Const., art. II, § 1, cl. 5.

12 The United States Supreme Court analyzed the Constitution's Qualifications 13 Clauses in the seminal case, U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995).
14 There the Court held that the Framers intended the foregoing language to "fix as 15 exclusive the qualifications in the Constitution," "thereby divest[ing] States of any power 16 to add qualifications." Id. at 801, 806. The Court reasoned that "the text and structure of 17 the Constitution, the relevant historical materials, and, most importantly, the "basic 18 principles of our democratic system' all demonstrate that the Qualifications Clauses were 19 intended to preclude the States from exercising any such power" Id. at 806.
20 Significantly, the Court rejected any notion that a state can cloak an otherwise 21 impermissible qualification as a ballot access issue subject to regulation by the states 22 under the Elections Clause,⁹ stating that states cannot indirectly create new eligibility 23 requirements by "dressing eligibility to stand for [public office] in ballot access clothing."
24 Id. at 831.

25 Factually, the Term Limits Court was confronted with an amendment to the state 26 constitution of Arkansas which would have prohibited any candidate having served more

27
28 ⁹ The Elections Clause allows states to set the "times, places and manner" of holding elections.
U.S. Const., art I, § 4, cl. 1.

1 than three terms in the United States House of Representatives, or two terms in the 2 United States Senate, from appearing on the state’s general election ballot for federal 3 congressional office. The Court held this attempt to alter federal eligibility 4 unconstitutional.¹⁰ In delineating the line between a state’s permissible power to craft 5 procedural requirements designed to foster ballot access and its impermissible power to 6 create new substantive qualifications for federal office, the Term Limits Court noted that 7 a statute certainly crosses that line if it “has the likely effect of handicapping a class of 8 candidates and has the sole purpose of creating additional qualifications indirectly.” Id.
9 at 836.

10 The Ninth Circuit, in Schaefer v. Townsend, 215 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 2000), further 11 illuminated the applicable standard by explaining that a statute creates a new, 12 unconstitutional qualification for federal office if it either “create[s] an absolute bar to 13 candidates who would otherwise qualify,” or “ha[s] the likely effect of handicapping an 14 otherwise qualified class of candidates.” Id. at 1035. The regulation at issue there 15 required that candidates for federal office be registered voters, and therefore residents of 16 the State of California, at the commencement of any candidacy for federal office.
17 California took the position that the regulation was a mere ballot access restriction 18 passed under its authority to regulate the time, place, and manner of federal elections.
19 There, as here, the State argued that it had the power to adopt “generally-applicable and 20 evenhanded restrictions that protect the integrity and reliability of the electoral process 21 itself.” Id. at 1037 (quoting Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 788 (1983)).

22 That court disagreed. According to the Ninth Circuit, regulations passing 23 constitutional muster under the Elections Clause regulated election procedures only and 24 ¹⁰ The Term Limits Court noted that the provision at issue there applied only to congressional 25 office under Article I of the Constitution, but it strongly intimated that the same rationale applied with just 26 as much force to the Qualifications Clause of Article II. Indeed, the Court made clear that states “have just 27 as much right, and no more, to prescribe new qualifications for a representative, as they have for a 28 president.” Id. at 803. Moreover, the Court observed that the Qualifications Clauses “reflect the idea that the Constitution treats both the President and Members of Congress as federal officers” over which the states only have delegated, as opposed to reserved, powers. Id. at 805 n. 17. The fact that the Term Limits Court referred to “Qualifications Clauses” in the plural further suggests that its reasoning applies equally to presidential qualifications.

1 “did not even arguably impose any substantive qualification rendering a class of potential 2 candidates ineligible for a ballot position.” Id. at 1038 (citing Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 3 835). While control over the procedural aspect of an election or requiring a candidate to 4 show a minimum level of support before running (and potentially crowding the ballot)¹¹ 5 may be permissible, Schaefer found that the residency requirement before it was not.
6 Instead, it plainly handicapped those candidates who did not comply and had the effect 7 of deterring them from running. Id.

8 Similarly, although the Act challenged in this case does not present an absolute 9 bar to candidates running for office, it is equally clear that, like in Schaefer, it has the 10 likely effect of “handicapping” non-disclosing candidates. The Act has nothing to do with 11 the extent of support a candidate may enjoy and plays no role in ensuring that 12 procedural integrity of the election. To the contrary, it prevents a number of candidates 13 from appearing on the primary ballot absent disclosure of their tax returns, and in so 14 doing impairs their ability to win California’s Republican presidential primary election, to 15 obtain the support of California’s delegates to the Republican National Convention, and 16 to secure the party’s nomination for President. This complete denial of ballot access 17 constitutes a severe handicap because “there is no denying that the ballot restrictions 18 will make it significantly more difficult for the barred candidate to win the election.”
19 514 U.S. at 831.¹² It follows that barring candidates in this manner is the type of burden 20 that “demands serious constitutional scrutiny.” Short v. Brown, 893 F.3d at 677.

21 The State’s Claim that the Act is a procedural “times, places and manner” 22 requirement permissible under the Elections Clause is simply not viable. Unsurprisingly, 23 ¹¹ See, e.g., Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 715, 718-19 (1974) (a state may restrict ballot access 24 to eliminate as many “frivolous candidac[ies]” as possible by requiring candidates to “demonstrat[e] the 25 existence of some reasonable quantum of voter support” through, for example, petitions signed by voters); 26 Ill State Bd. of Elections v. Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. 173, 185 (1979) (“[W]e have upheld properly drawn statutes that require a preliminary showing of a significant modicum of support before a candidate or party may appear on the ballot.”).

27 ¹² While the State argues that the disclosure requirement does not apply to the general election, 28 that distinction does not save the Act since the Supreme Court has long held that constitutional requirements apply just as squarely to primaries as they do to the general election. See Tashjian v.
Republican Party, 479 U.S. 208, 227 (1986).

1 the Term Limits Court held that the Elections Clause implicitly prohibits states from 2 enacting provisions designed to benefit or to hinder certain candidates. Term Limits, 3 514 U.S. at 833-34 (“[T]he Framers understood the Elections Clause as a grant of 4 authority to issue procedural regulations, and not as a source of power to dictate 5 electoral outcomes, to favor or disfavor a class of candidates, or to evade important 6 constitutional restraints”) (emphasis added). The procedural grant of power to the states 7 extended by the Elections Clause instead “encompasses matters like ‘notices, 8 registration, supervision of voting, protection of voters, prevention of fraud and corrupt 9 practices, counting of votes, duties of inspectors and canvassers, and making and 10 publication of election returns.’” Cook v. Gralike, 531 U.S. 510, 523-24 (2001) (citing 11 Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 366 (1932)).

12 To the extent the Act mandates disclosure of tax returns to qualify for the 13 presidential primary, it does none of those things and, despite Defendants’ best efforts, it 14 simply cannot be characterized as procedural. Its provisions do not pertain to the 15 administration of an election (e.g., reducing ballot clutter by excluding candidates without 16 sufficient electoral support). Nor can it be considered an even-handed restriction to 17 “protect the integrity and reliability of the electoral process itself” or to ensure “orderly, 18 fair, and honest elections” by providing financial information to voters. Term Limits, 19 514 U.S. at 834. If this was truly the State’s even-handed objective, it presumably would 20 have passed some version of the Act in 1992, when former California Governor Jerry 21 Brown elected not to release his tax returns while running for the Democratic nomination 22 for President. At base, the Act seeks to punish a class of candidates who elect not to 23 comply with disclosing their tax returns by handicapping their access to the electoral 24 process.¹³ This is plainly impermissible.

25 _____
26 ¹³ The State’s argument that a “class of constitutional concern” must be identified in order to entitle 27 a group of candidates to qualify for such protection, and that no qualifying class in that respect has been 28 identified here, is unpersuasive. Defs.’ Opp, 8:25-27. Despite the State’s contention, no authority for any such limitation has been identified. Instead, by barring all qualifications other than those set out in the Constitution, the Framers exhibited concern for all “candidates who would otherwise meet the requirements of the Qualifications Clause.” Schaefer, 215 F.3d at 1035. To read the phrase “class of constitutional concern” otherwise would nullify the Qualifications Clause.

1 The Supreme Court’s decision in Cook v. Gralicke, 531 U.S. 510 (2001), is also 2 helpful in underscoring the conclusion that this Act is constitutionally impermissible. In 3 that case, Missouri passed an initiative that required ballots to disclose whether federal 4 candidates for the House and Senate supported Congressional term limits. Id. at 514.
5 Missouri defended its legislation on grounds that it “merely regulated the manner in 6 which elections are held by disclosing information about congressional candidates” and 7 consequently was a valid exercise of Missouri’s delegated power under the Elections 8 Clause. Id. at 523. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the law bore “no relation 9 to the ‘manner’ of elections as we understand it.” Id. Instead, the law was “plainly 10 designed to favor candidates” supporting term limits in an attempt to handicap those 11 candidates who did not. Id. at 524. According to the Court, the Constitution’s grant of 12 power to the states “to prescribe the procedural mechanisms for federal elections” does 13 not include the ability “to dictate electoral outcomes, to favor or disfavor a class of 14 candidates, or to evade important constitutional constraints.” Id. at 523.

15 Moreover, the Court pointed out, “by directing the citizen’s attention to the single 16 consideration of the candidate’s fidelity to term limits,” the Missouri law implied that the 17 issue was “an important—perhaps paramount—consideration in the citizen’s choice.” Id.
18 at 525. It, therefore, could potentially, “decisively influence the citizen to cast his ballot 19 against candidates branded as unfaithful” to the idea of term limits. Id. Similarly in this 20 case, the Act draws undue attention to that class of candidates electing not to disclose 21 their tax returns, and by so doing operates to brand them as inferior. As such, the Act 22 imposes an additional substantive qualification beyond the exclusive confines of the 23 Qualifications Clause and is likely invalid on that basis as well.

24 Furthermore, from a practical perspective, allowing individual states to potentially 25 adopt disparate and inconsistent qualifications for presidential primary candidates 26 tramples the Framers’ vision of having uniform standards for the qualifications of those 27 individuals running for President. Former California Governor Jerry Brown’s admonition 28 in vetoing the Act’s earlier iteration is particularly instructive on this point. If allowed to

1 stand, the Act would potentially open the floodgates permitting each state to foreclose 2 ballot access to presidential candidates on various alleged informational grounds. The 3 Court can easily foresee this extending far beyond tax information to the disclosure of 4 confidential medical records, psychiatric and therapist records, academic records, family 5 law records, or other privileged information.¹⁴ The list of allegedly “relevant” information 6 required to obtain ballot access could therefore snowball out of control with no practical 7 limitation as legislatures throughout the nation could impose their own qualifications on 8 presidential candidates, perhaps for nakedly political purposes. That result cannot 9 possibly comport with the Framers’ goal for a fixed and nationwide standard for such 10 federal offices.

11 Finally, in this day and age of partisan politics, evaluating the constitutionality of 12 the Act is one of the most non-partisan questions of which the Court can conceive. At 13 oral argument, there were repeated references to this being a “Republican” issue, but 14 the protections afforded by the Qualifications Clause extend to all candidates 15 irrespective of their political affiliation. While this case concerns a law passed by a 16 Democratic majority in the California Legislature, and while it fundamentally targets a 17 Republican presidential candidate, in a different political climate or a different state the 18 roles and putative requirements could easily be reversed. The dangerous precedent set 19 by this Act, allowing the controlling party in any state’s legislature to add substantive 20 requirements as a precondition to qualifying for the state’s presidential primary ballot, 21 should concern all candidates alike, Republican, Democrat, or otherwise. It certainly 22 concerns the Court. But ultimately, neither the Constitution nor the Court are concerned 23 with which party a candidate or voter most closely aligns. As such, for all of the reasons

24 ///

25 ¹⁴ It is not difficult to imagine that a state could find, for example, just as compelling a reason to 26 force release of a candidate’s mental and physical health records for “informational” purposes, particularly 27 where a candidate might be older or have some preexisting health concerns. The troubling minefield this 28 presents is all too apparent in terms of permitting each state to make its own informational demands.
While there is little analytical difference in terms of the Act’s stated “informational” purpose from the alleged “information” that such records might provide, the invasion of privacy concerns would make any such mandate almost assuredly unconstitutional.

1 set forth above, the Court finds that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail on their contention that 2 the Act violates that Clause.

3 2. First Amendment Rights of Association and Ballot Access

4 The Constitution guarantees, among other things, “the right of individuals to 5 associate for the advancement of political beliefs, and the right of qualified voters, 6 regardless of their political persuasion, to cast their votes effectively.” Ill. State Bd. of 7 Elections, 440 U.S. at 184 (quoting Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 30 (1968)). Ballot 8 access restrictions “implicate the right to vote” because “limiting the choices available to 9 voters . . . impairs the voter’s ability to express their political preferences.” Id. The rights 10 of individual voters to associate with, and vote for, the candidate of their choice “rank 11 among our most precious freedoms.” Williams, 393 U.S. at 30-31 (citing Wesberry v.
12 Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 17 (1964)). Moreover, as the Supreme Court also noted, the 13 “freedom to associate as a political party” also “has diminished practical value if the party 14 can be kept off the ballot.” Ill. State Bd. Of Elections, 440 U.S. at 184.

15 According to Plaintiffs, by barring partisan presidential candidates who decline to 16 release their tax returns from appearing on the California primary ballot, the Act imposes 17 a severe burden on voters’ ability to access the ballot and vote for the candidate of their 18 choice. Additionally, President Trump further claims that the Act similarly burdens his 19 ability to appear on the Republican primary ballot and to associate with Republican 20 voters in California. The Trump Campaign as well as the Republican National 21 Committee and the California Republican Party make similar arguments.

22 To evaluate these arguments, the Court applies the so-called Anderson/Burdick 23 test established by the Supreme Court in Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780 (1983) 24 and Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428 (1982). To the extent that voting rights “are 25 subjected to ‘severe’ restrictions, the regulation must be ‘narrowly drawn to advance a 26 state interest of compelling importance,’” with a strict level of scrutiny therefore imposed.
27 Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434 (quoting Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 289 (1992)). Should 28 the restriction at issue trigger less than strict scrutiny, a balancing test is instead

1 employed. Courts must weigh 1) the character and magnitude of the asserted injury to 2 the rights protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments; 2) the precise interests 3 and justifications put forward by the state for the imposed ballot restriction; and 3) the 4 extent to which the state's interests make it necessary to burden the plaintiff's rights.
5 See Anderson, 460 U.S. at 789. Even restrictions that impose a lesser burden in this 6 regard must be reasonably related to furthering the state's important regulatory interests.
7 Chamness v. Bowen, 722 F.3d 1110, 1116, (9th Cir. 2013). To the extent the 8 presidential race is national in scope, a state's interests in regulating presidential 9 elections is weaker than for purely statewide elections. Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795.¹⁵

10 Here, the Act creates what amounts to a functional bar against the ability to cast 11 an effective vote for a candidate who elects not to disclose his or her tax returns. It 12 further interferes with the ability of both individuals and political parties to select the 13 individual presidential candidate of their choice to act as the "standard bearer who best 14 represents [their] ideologies and preferences." Eu v. San Francisco Democratic Comm., 15 489 U.S. 214, 224 (1989).¹⁶ In this case that includes the incumbent President of the 16 United States. These are severe restrictions, since limitations on ballot access can 17 violate multiple constitutionally-protected interests, including the right to associate for 18 ///

19 ///

21 ¹⁵ While the State disagrees, insisting that "the Act regulates only California's presidential primary 22 election, the result of which is determined by in-state voters" (Defs.' Opp, 11:21-23), that argument misses 23 the mark. As a practical matter, presidential primaries impact the primaries in other states and therefore 24 impact the general election as well. Indeed, California's recent change in moving its primary from June to 25 March appears in part to have been intended to garner more say in the national nominating process. See 26 SB 568 Primary Elections: Election Date, California Legislative Information, "Bill Analysis" Tab, Assembly 27 Floor Analysis 2 (Sept. 13, 2017).

28 ¹⁶ It is also no small matter that where, as here, the limitation on ballot access involves a candidate at the top of the primary ticket in California. A restriction on the ability to vote for that candidate could likely depress the party's voter turnout in general, and therefore adversely affect down-ballot congressional and state-level candidates as well. This is particularly true in California since voters approved a "Top Two Primary" system, where the two candidates receiving the most votes in the primary proceed to the general election regardless of their party affiliation. See Bryant Decl., Case No.19-cv-1506-MCE-DB, ECF No. 17-3, ¶¶ 11-13.

1 political purposes, the right to vote, and the right to express political preferences.¹⁷

2 Ill. State Bd. Of Elections, 440 U.S. at 184; Chamness, 722 F.3d at 1116 (a measure
3 which “significantly impairs” ballot access “imposes a severe First Amendment 4 restriction”).¹⁸ As such, they are subject to strict scrutiny.

5 The fact that a candidate can still conceivably qualify for the primary as a write-in 6 or independent candidate does not change that calculus. See Anderson, 460 U.S. at 7 799 n.26 (“We have previously noted that [a write-in] opportunity is not an adequate 8 substitute for having the candidate’s name appear on the printed ballot.”); Term Limits, 9 514 U.S. at 831 (“[E]ven if petitioners are correct that incumbents may occasionally win 10 reelection as write-in candidates, there is no denying that the ballot restrictions will make 11 it significantly more difficult for the barred candidate to win the election.”).

12 Nor can Defendants show that the Act is either narrowly drawn or serves a 13 compelling state interest. To the extent that the State argues that a candidate’s asserted 14 “choice” in deciding whether to disclose tax returns makes the restriction narrow in 15 scope, the Supreme Court’s decision in Cook is instructive. There, as indicated above, 16 the Supreme Court struck down a Missouri constitutional amendment which directed the 17 Secretary of State to identify on the ballot those candidates who did not support federal 18 term limits. That was also a “voluntary” act that the Court struck down as 19 unconstitutional. Yet this case goes even further in keeping a candidate’s name off the 20 21 ¹⁷ The State nonetheless contends that any burden is only “slight” because all candidates are able 22 to disclose their financial interests if they choose to do so. But that is not the point. The logistical burdens 23 of disclosure in this case are minimal compared to the burden of constitutional concern, which is forcing 24 candidates to make the choice between running for President and disclosing their tax returns. See 25 Schaefer, 215 F.3d at 1037 (forcing out-of-state candidates to choose between relocating or being barred 26 from the ballot constituted an impermissible qualification). States cannot avoid the First Amendment’s 27 protections by disingenuously characterizing a condition as “voluntary,” when it is fact coerced. See Term 28 Limits, 514 U.S. at 829 (“As we have often noted, constitutional rights would be of little value if they could be indirectly denied”). Moreover, the fact that candidates may be able to disclose their tax returns if they so choose does not change the fact that voters also have a First Amendment right to associate with and nominate candidates who refuse to do so.

¹⁸ Requiring presidential candidates to disclose tax returns in order to exercise First Amendment rights to access voters is a severe burden both because of the fundamental nature of those rights and since, as the Ninth Circuit has recognized, “[a] tax return and related information contains many intimate details about the taxpayer’s personal and financial life” to which a taxpayer has a right of privacy. United States v. Richey, 924 F.2d 857, 861 (9th Cir. 1991).

1 ballot entirely, and Cook's finding of unconstitutionality therefore applies with even more 2 force here.

3 Moreover, the Cook Court also rejected the argument that Missouri's purported 4 objective in educating or notifying voters as to a candidate's stance on terms limits was 5 compelling. While a state may educate voters as to the "procedural mechanisms" for 6 federal elections, they cannot "dictate electoral outcomes, to favor or disfavor a class of 7 candidates" or "evade important constitutional restraints" under the guise of voter 8 education. Cook, 531 U.S. at 531. In this case, the State's interest in doing so in the 9 first place is further weakened by the fact that the Act purports to restrict access to the 10 federal presidential primary, where it "has a less important interest" in regulation than in 11 statewide or local elections since the outcome of the race "will be largely determined by 12 voters beyond the State's boundaries." Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795.¹⁹ At the end of the 13 day a voter can simply decline to vote for a candidate who chooses not to release his or 14 her tax returns. Simply allowing voters to make that choice without further interference is 15 clearly the narrowest, and least intrusive, approach of all.

16 The State's professed interest in voter education is somewhat specious in any 17 event because it does not extend to all candidates in every scenario. Instead, the Act 18 applies only to party-affiliated candidates (exempting independent and write-in 19 candidates) and affects only the primary, and not the general, election. If California 20 legitimately wanted to "provide voters with essential information regarding the 21 candidate's potential conflicts of interest" to help them make a more informed decision, 22 as the interest statement contained in Government Code § 6881 indicates, it would keep 23 the tax returns public through the general election and not remove them from the 24 Secretary of State's website once the primary election concludes. It is also difficult to 25 see how the Act's mandate in directing production of tax returns is "narrowly drawn" to 26 protect the state's purported interest in ensuring that voters are informed as to potential

27 ¹⁹ The fact that states have more leeway in regulating congressional elections under the Elections 28 Clause than they do in presidential elections is therefore not surprising. See, e.g., Arizona v. Inter Tribal Council of Arizona, Inc., 570 U.S. 1, 8 (2013); Rucho v. Common Cause, 139 S. Ct. 2484, 2495 (2019).

1 conflicts of interest when the provisions of EIGA already require candidates to submit 2 detailed financial information concerning the extent of income, gifts and property 3 holdings as well as the identification of any positions held in a business enterprise. See 4 5 U.S.C.A. Appx. 4, § 102. The State has not identified anything missing on an EIGA 5 disclosure that could be found on a tax return to serve the Act's purported interests.
6 Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail on their claim that the 7 Act violates their First Amendment rights to freedom of association and ballot access.

8 3. Equal Protection under the Fourteenth Amendment

9 The Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause guarantees that "[n]o state 10 shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S.
11 Const., amend. XIV, § 1. Two of the related cases, filed on behalf of the Griffin and 12 Melendez Plaintiffs (Case Nos. 2:19-cv-1477-MCE-DB and 2:19-cv-1506-MCE-DB, 13 respectively), argue that the Act is unconstitutional to the extent it requires a political 14 party's candidates for President to disclose his or her tax returns in the primary election 15 but exempts independent candidates from doing so. By distinguishing among 16 constitutionally eligible candidates for President in that manner, Plaintiffs argue that the 17 Act imposes greater burdens on the voting and associational rights of California voters 18 who support major party candidates than those who support independents. According to 19 Plaintiffs, this triggers equal protection concerns. See Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. at 716 20 ("The right of a party or an individual to a place on the ballot is entitled to protection and 21 is intertwined with the rights of voters"); see also Matsumoto v. Pua, 775 F.2d 1393, 22 1396 (9th Cir. 1985).

23 In Anderson, the Supreme Court cautioned courts to carefully scrutinize laws 24 which impose "burden[s] that fall unequally on major-party and independent candidates."
25 460 U.S. at 793-94; see also Soltysik v. Padilla, 910 F.3d 438, 446 (9th Cir. 2018) 26 (recognizing that plaintiff had stated valid equal protection claim where state law 27 imposed an "unequal burden" on independent as opposed to party-affiliated candidates).
28 While distinctions in how the two groups are treated may be permissible, that is only the 1 case where those distinctions are constitutionally relevant. Jenness v. Fortson, 403 U.S.

2 431, 441 (1971) (recognizing that the needs and potential of a political party with 3 historically broad support differ from a new or broad political organization, and that 4 consequently the latter may be exempt from having to establish all the criteria of a well-5 established party in order to participate in primaries).

6 The Ninth Circuit has recognized, however, that independent candidates seeking 7 to run in the general election are “essentially similar” to partisan candidates seeking to 8 run in a party primary. Van Susteren v. Jones, 331 F.3d 1024, 1027 (9th Cir. 2003).
9 Accordingly, there is no basis for subjecting the two groups to different burdens. The 10 State lacks any valid interest in providing voters with more information about party-11 backed candidates than independent candidates, especially when such requirements 12 can lead to the exclusion of only major party candidates from the ballot. Consequently, 13 Plaintiffs are likely to succeed in demonstrating that the differing burdens are 14 unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause as well.

15 4. Preemption by the Ethics in Government Act (“EIGA”)

16 Finally as to the merits, and as already mentioned above, Title I of EIGA provides 17 for the disclosure of “source, type, and amount or value of income”; honoraria from any 18 source; dividends, rents, interest, and capital gains, and interests in property; the “entity 19 and category of value of the total liabilities owed to any creditor”; and the identity of all 20 positions held “as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, representative, 21 employee, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other 22 business enterprise, any nonprofit organization, any labor organization, or any 23 educational or other institution.” See generally 5 U.S.C.A. App. 4, § 102. Title I of the 24 EIGA also protects candidates from the need to make different or additional disclosure 25 by expressly displacing all other similar federal or state disclosure laws. It expressly 26 “supersede[s] any general requirement under any other provision of law or regulation 27 with respect to the reporting of information required for purposes of preventing conflicts 28 of interest or apparent conflicts of interest.” Id. at § 107(b).

1 Like EIGA, by requiring production of a candidate's tax returns for the preceding 2 five years, the Act also purports to provide for the disclosure of extensive financial 3 information by candidates running for President, with one of its chief purposes being "to 4 provide voters with essential information regarding the candidates' potential conflicts of 5 interest, business dealings, financial status, and charitable donations." Cal. Elec. Code 6 § 6881. As such, according to the Trump Plaintiffs, the Act is plainly a "law or regulation
7 with respect to the reporting of information required for purposes of preventing conflicts
8 of interest" as described by EIGA, and by EIGA's express provisions it is preempted.

9 The State nonetheless claims that because § 107(b) makes no explicit reference 10 to preemption of state law, and because a previous version of the statute did explicitly do 11 so in another context, no preemptive intent should be inferred. See Defs.' Opp., 27:21-12 28:11. In this regard, the State cites a presumption against preemption, in fields 13 traditionally occupied by the states, unless the clear and manifest purpose of Congress 14 suggests otherwise.

15 Defendants' statement of the law may be correct, but it has no bearing here 16 because regulation of federal officeholders is clearly not a field traditionally occupied by 17 the states. Moreover, although the words "state" and "preemption" appear nowhere in 18 the text of § 107(b), the statute is nonetheless unambiguous. Congress clearly intended 19 that the EIGA "supersede" state laws touching on the field of financial disclosures and 20 conflict-of-interest laws for federal officeholders. "Supersede" means to "[o]bliterate, set 21 aside, annul, replace, make void, inefficacious or useless, repeal." See Black's Law 22 Dictionary (6th ed. 1990). Section 107(b) of EIGA therefore "set[s] aside" and 23 "replace[s]" "any general requirement under any other provision of law or regulation with 24 respect to the reporting of information required for purposes of preventing conflicts of 25 interest or apparent conflicts of interest." By using the expansive term "any" with the 26 phrase "other provision of law or regulation," the plain and ordinary language of EIGA

27 ///

28 ///

1 unambiguously gives it preemptive force over the Act.²⁰ Plaintiffs are accordingly likely 2 to prevail on the merits with respect to EIGA preemption as well.

3 B. Irreparable Harm

4 Moving on to the remaining inquiries in evaluating whether preliminary injunctive 5 relief is warranted, the Court turns first to irreparable harm. The Ninth Circuit has long 6 recognized that constitutional violations in general constitute irreparable harm. See, 7 e.g., Stormans, Inc. v. Stelecky, 586 F.3d 1109, 1138 (9th Cir. 2009) (“constitutional 8 violations cannot be adequately remedied through damages” and therefore generally 9 constitute irreparable harm); Goldie’s Bookstore, Inc. v. Super. Ct., 739 F.2d 466, 472 10 (9th Cir. 1984) (an alleged constitutional infringement by deprivation of equal protection 11 “will often alone constitute irreparable harm.”). This is particularly true in cases, like this 12 one, challenging candidate qualifications restricting ballot access. See Matsumoto, 13 775 F.2d at 1395-96. The rationale for such a finding is simple: “If the plaintiffs lack an 14 adequate opportunity to gain placement on the ballot for this year’s election, this 15 infringement on their rights cannot be alleviated after the election.” Council of Alternative 16 Political Parties v. Hooks, 121 F.3d 876, 883 (3d Cir. 1997).

17 The Ninth Circuit has further emphasized that “the loss of First Amendment 18 freedoms, for even minimal periods of time, unquestionably constitutes irreparable 19 injury.” Klein v. City of San Clemente, 584 F.3d 1196, 1208 (9th Cir. 2009).

20 Given the findings above that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail in establishing 21 constitutional violations premised on both the Qualifications Clause, First Amendment 22 rights of association and ballot access, and Fourteenth Amendment rights grounded in 23 equal protection, this Court finds that the requisite irreparable harm is present and that 24 this factor weighs in favor of granting a preliminary injunction.

25 ///

26 ///

27 _____
28 ²⁰ Given the statute’s plain and ordinary meaning, any resort to legislative history is unnecessary.
See Conn. Nat’l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 254 (1992).

1 forth in the Fourteenth Amendment; and 5) is preempted by the provisions of EIGA in 2 any event.

3 The Court further finds that Plaintiffs have demonstrated irreparable harm, have 4 shown that the balance of equities weighs in their favor, and have established to the 5 Court's satisfaction that the public interest tips in favor of enjoining implementation of the 6 Act insofar as it pertains to candidates for President of the United States. Plaintiffs' 7 various Motions for Preliminary Injunction in the related cases are therefore GRANTED.
8 Defendants are hereby ENJOINED from enforcing the provisions of the Presidential Tax 9 Transparency and Accountability Act to the extent they require candidates for the 10 presidency to disclose their tax returns as a condition of appearing on California's 11 presidential primary ballot. See Cal. Elec. Code §§ 6883-6884. No bond will be 12 required.
